Sutro – the indie, alt-electronic quartet from Portland, OR, release their highly anticipated, full-length album, Broken Distance.

Band members Tyler Stone (vocals, programming), Patrick Hinds (guitar), Jesse Gay (keyboards, programming) and Keenan Wayne (bass) deliver a new set of songs that are more formed, more melodically incisive, and more diverse than anything they have previously released. Some of that credit goes, of course, to producer Joe Chiccarelli (Beck, Spoon, Morrissey, The White Stripes), who helped the group hone its craft, adhere to fundamentals, and eke the maximum emotion and fullest potential out of the music for this 10 song LP. Says Chiccarelli of the endeavor, “They are the perfect balance of beats and atmospheric electronic elements and accessible pop song writing.”

The new recordings add live drums to Sutro’s sound and emphasize richer-than-ever songwriting, yet technology remains at the core of what Sutro does. Their music is a willful fusion of electronic and live aesthetics. Stone’s sensual voice and the group’s elegantly synthesized arrangements embody both the tension and connection between flesh and machine. Sutro uses electronics to appear all the more self-reflective, all the more fragile, all the more human.

Born out of the San Francisco nightlife, Sutro drew inspiration from the members' shared love for the urban, downtempo electronic music scene. Sutro embarked on a new chapter when 2/3s of the band moved to Portland Oregon. Here they added their fourth member, keyboard player/programmer Jesse Gay and solidified their new, bolder sound with more fully realized songs, richer melodies and more expansive production that define their latest release, Broken Distance.
